There was some truth in the portraval of the Negro preacher who represented him as selling garment after garments until he had "come to himself," and there was nothing left. Physically and spiritually that was true. He was bare of body and of soul, but, fortunately, he was not bereft of the one last vestige of common sense and action.

In the depth of his condition of distress, home seemed a very different sort of place. He pictured the hired servants of his father as possessing something that he had lost, and he determined, though it must have been an abject thing, to go back to the home and the father whom he had spurned, to cast himself upon the father's mercy and to ask only that he might have the place of a servant.

More than one prodigal has thus returned, sometimes failing to find a very warm reception. There have been fathers who have been stern and unyielding to the returning of the father, thoughtful, merciful magnanimous, with the rich and gracious love that is above all deals with this repentant son in terms of what may be tomorrow, and not in terms of the failure and tragedy of vesterday.
